

Obsession's Dark Embrace

Copyright Notice:

This story is a work of fan fiction inspired by the Harry Potter series. All recognizable characters, settings, and concepts belong to J.K. Rowling and the respective copyright holders. This story is written purely for entertainment purposes and is not intended for commercial use. Any magical elements, spells, or settings referenced from the Harry Potter universe remain the intellectual property of their original creators.

⚠️ Beware, for magic binds these words, and within them lies a story so enchanting, even the Dark Lord himself would be intrigued. ⚠️

These pages whisper secrets older than time, laced with the kind of darkness that lingers long after the final spell is cast. The ink itself is bewitched, each letter woven with spells of obsession and power. Enter at your own risk, dear reader, for once you turn the page, there is no escape from the shadows that beckon you forward. And remember—this is not just a love story. It is a curse, one that binds not just the heart, but the very soul. 💖 ✨

And always remember: It's okay to fall for the same gender. Love knows no boundaries, no limits, and no rules. 💖 🔥

Description:

He was dangerous. He was untouchable. And yet, he was utterly obsessed—with her.

"I'd suggest you walk away before you regret it."

His voice was low, menacing, eyes burning with unspoken rage. The poor fool who had dared to stand too close to her swallowed hard before disappearing into the shadows. But she—she wasn't afraid. She should have been. But the way his hand gripped her waist, the way his lips hovered just above her ear, sent a shiver down her spine that had nothing to do with fear.

"You really like testing my patience, don't you, love?" His smirk was wicked, his touch possessive. And Merlin help her, but she liked it.

Chapter 1: The Beginning of a Dangerous Game

Y/N knew better than to get involved with someone like Draco Malfoy. Arrogant, cold, and untouchable—he was every bit the Slytherin prince that Hogwarts whispered about. But fate had other plans.

It started with stolen glances across the Great Hall. The way his silver eyes always seemed to find hers, even in a crowded room. The way he leaned just a little too close when he walked past, voice silkier than sin when he muttered, "Careful where you wander, love. You never know who might be watching."

Y/N wasn't naive. She knew the rumours. Draco Malfoy was dangerous. He was possessive. But nothing prepared her for the moment he finally snapped.

She had been talking to Theodore Nott near the Slytherin common room, completely unaware of the storm brewing behind her. She only realized it when Theo's eyes flickered past her, turning cautious. A chill ran down her spine before she even turned around.

"Walk away, Nott."

Draco's voice was smooth, but there was an edge of danger beneath it. His hands were in his pockets, his stance deceptively relaxed, but Y/N could see the tension in his jaw, the way his silver eyes darkened.

Theo smirked slightly but raised his hands in surrender. "Easy, Malfoy. We were just talking."

"I don't recall asking."

Y/N barely had time to react before Draco's hand wrapped around her wrist, pulling her away from the corridor and into the shadows. The moment they were alone, his grip tightened ever so slightly.

"What the hell was that?" she hissed, jerking her wrist free.

Draco stepped closer, towering over her. "You tell me, love. What were you doing giggling at Nott like that?"

Her brows furrowed. "We were just talking!"

He smirked, but there was no amusement in his expression. "Oh, were you? Because from where I was standing, it looked like you were testing me."

Y/N crossed her arms, lifting her chin defiantly. "And if I was?"

Something dark flickered in his eyes before he leaned in, voice dangerously low. "Then you're playing a very dangerous game, darling."

Chapter 2: A Warning in the Dark

The corridors were empty, dimly lit by flickering torches, but she could feel it—his presence, his gaze burning into her skin.

"I warned you, Y/N," his voice was a whisper against her ear before she felt herself pinned against the cold stone wall.

She gasped, but not out of fear. The intensity in his eyes, the grip on her wrist—it sent a thrill through her she didn't dare admit.

"Draco—"

His name barely left her lips before his fingers tilted her chin up, forcing her to meet his gaze. "You think I don't notice? The way they look at you? The way you smile at them?" His voice was dangerously low, his lips hovering just inches from hers. "I don't share, love."

Her breath hitched. "You don't own me."

His smirk was slow, dark, full of something that made her knees weak. "Oh, but I do."

Before she could respond, his hand trailed down to her waist, fingers pressing possessively against the fabric of her robe. He leaned in, his breath warm against her skin.

"You think I didn't see the way Diggory was looking at you today?" His voice dripped with venom. "Or the way you let Potter stand too close in Potions?"

Y/N scoffed. "You're delusional."

His grip tightened slightly, not enough to hurt, but enough to remind her of the power he held over her. "Am I? Because right now, you're trapped against this wall, love. And you're not even trying to get away."

Her stomach twisted. He was right. She should have been pushing him off, running in the opposite direction. But instead, her fingers twitched at her sides, resisting the urge to reach for him.

Draco's lips brushed against her jaw, feather-light. "Admit it," he murmured. "You like it when I get jealous."

She turned her face away, trying to suppress the warmth pooling in her stomach. "You're impossible."

He chuckled, dark and deep. "And yet, you're still here."

Her silence was all the confirmation he needed.

Chapter 3: The Fire That Burns

The castle was quiet at this hour, the corridors dimly lit by the soft glow of enchanted torches. Y/N hurried through the hallways, her heart pounding as she tried to make sense of what had just happened. Draco Malfoy—arrogant, possessive, and utterly intoxicating—had pinned her against the wall, spoken words that left her breathless, and then walked away as if nothing had happened.

She hated him. She hated the way he made her feel. And yet, she couldn't deny the fire he had ignited within her.

"Lost, are we?"

The voice sent a shiver down her spine. She turned sharply, only to find Draco leaning casually against one of the stone pillars, his silver eyes gleaming under the dim light. His smirk was as infuriating as ever.

"What do you want, Malfoy?" she snapped, crossing her arms.

He took slow, deliberate steps toward her. "What do I want? Now, that's an interesting question." His voice was velvety smooth, laced with an edge of something dark and dangerous. "You see, love, I don't particularly enjoy watching you smile at other men."

She scoffed. "Oh, so now you're monitoring my smiles?"

Draco smirked but said nothing as he closed the distance between them. "Do you know what it does to me? Seeing you with them? Watching you laugh at their pathetic jokes?" His voice dropped to a whisper, his fingers brushing against her wrist. "It drives me mad, Y/N."

Her breath hitched. "You're insane."

"Possibly." His fingers trailed up her arm, leaving a trail of heat in their wake. "But you're the one making me this way."

Y/N swallowed hard, forcing herself to ignore the way her body reacted to him. "You have no right to dictate who I talk to, Malfoy."

He chuckled darkly. "And yet, here you are—still arguing, still standing here, instead of walking away."

Her fists clenched at her sides. He was right. Again. She should have turned around, should have left him standing there in the shadows. But instead, she found herself trapped by the intensity of his gaze.

Draco reached out, tucking a loose strand of hair behind her ear. "Tell me to leave, and I will."

She opened her mouth, but no words came. Her heart betrayed her, hammering against her ribcage as he leaned in, his lips dangerously close to hers.

"That's what I thought," he murmured.

Before she could stop herself, her hands pressed against his chest, a feeble attempt to put some distance between them. But instead of pushing him away, her fingers curled against the fabric of his shirt, anchoring herself to the storm he had unleashed within her.

Draco's smirk deepened. "You're playing with fire, darling."

"Then burn me," she whispered.

His lips crashed against hers, possessive, demanding, utterly consuming. She melted into him, letting the flames consume her whole.

And in that moment, she knew—there was no escaping Draco Malfoy. Not now. Not ever.

Chapter 4: Bound by Shadows

The tension between them had grown unbearable. It was as if the very air around them crackled with an invisible force, pulling them together despite the chaos brewing within Y/N's mind. She should have walked away. She should have resisted the intoxicating pull of Draco Malfoy. But when had she ever been wise enough to make the right choice?

It had been days since their last encounter, yet the memory of his possessive touch still burned on her skin. Every time she passed him in the corridors, she felt the weight of his gaze on her, the heat of his unspoken words wrapping around her like a spell. It was suffocating and addicting all at once.

Tonight, the castle was eerily silent, the usual whispers and footsteps lost to the darkness. Y/N had ventured out, unable to sleep, seeking solace in the dimly lit hallways. But she wasn't alone. She felt it before she saw him.

"You really don't listen, do you?" His voice was a whisper against the cold air, sending a shiver down her spine.

Y/N turned, her heart pounding as Draco stepped out of the shadows. His platinum hair glowed under the torchlight; his silver eyes gleaming with something dangerous.

"I don't need your warnings, Malfoy." She crossed her arms, feigning a confidence she didn't quite feel.

He smirked, stepping closer. "No? Then what do you need, love?"

His words wrapped around her like a silken noose, tightening with every breath. Y/N swallowed hard, but before she could speak, Draco was in front of her, close enough that she could see the darkness swirling in his irises.

"You've been avoiding me," he murmured, tilting his head as if studying her. "That's not very wise."

Y/N scoffed, forcing herself to hold his gaze. "You're delusional if you think I owe you my time."

Draco chuckled, low and dangerous. "Oh, but you do, darling." His fingers brushed against her wrist, a ghost of a touch. "Because whether you admit it or not, you belong to me."

Y/N's breath hitched. "You don't own me."

His smirk deepened. "Don't I?"

Before she could protest, his grip tightened—not harsh, not painful, just enough to send a thrill through her veins. "Tell me, Y/N," he whispered, his lips a mere breath away from hers. "Why haven't you pushed me away yet?"

She hated that she didn't have an answer.

Chapter 5: Tempting the Devil

The next morning, Y/N tried to focus on her studies, on the mundane reality of Hogwarts life, but Draco Malfoy had embedded himself into her thoughts like a curse.

It didn't help that he was everywhere—watching her during breakfast, standing too close in the library, lingering outside her classrooms with that same infuriating smirk.

By the time evening fell, she had had enough. If he wanted to play games, she would show him she wasn't just a pawn.

She found him in the Astronomy Tower, leaning against the stone railing, the evening breeze ruffling his perfectly styled hair. He looked utterly unbothered, as if he hadn't spent days tormenting her with his presence.

"Enjoying yourself?" she asked, crossing her arms.

Draco turned, his lips curling into a slow, knowing smile. "Immensely. And you?"

She exhaled sharply, stepping closer. "I don't appreciate being stalked."

He laughed—a low, rich sound that sent heat pooling in her stomach. "Stalked? That's a rather dramatic accusation, love."

Y/N raised an eyebrow. "Then what do you call this? Always being around, always watching me like I'm some kind of—"

"Obsession?" he finished smoothly, his eyes darkening.

Her breath caught in her throat.

Draco pushed off the railing, closing the distance between them. "You don't get it, do you?" he murmured, his fingers ghosting over her jaw. "I don't just want you, Y/N. I need you."

The sincerity in his voice was almost worse than the arrogance. It was raw, unguarded, terrifyingly real.

“Draco—”

His lips barely brushed against her ear, sending a shiver through her. “Say you don’t feel it,” he challenged, his voice barely a whisper. “Say you don’t crave this just as much as I do, and I’ll Walk away.”

Her heart pounded painfully against her ribs. The air between them crackled with something unspoken, something dangerous.

But she couldn’t say it.

Because it would be a lie.

And they both knew it.

Chapter 6: The Fire Within

The crackling fire in the Slytherin common room cast flickering shadows across the walls. Y/N sat curled up in a corner, pretending to read, but she could feel the weight of his gaze from across the room.

Draco had been watching her all night. Ever since their last encounter, the tension between them had grown unbearable. Every time she glanced his way, his silver eyes darkened, a silent warning and a promise wrapped into one.

She turned a page in her book, but she knew she wasn’t fooling anyone.

In a blink, Draco was beside her, his fingers brushing the edge of her book as he leaned in. “Tell me, love, are you actually reading that? Or are you just pretending so you can ignore me?”

Y/N’s fingers tightened on the pages. “Maybe I just don’t have anything to say to you.”

He chuckled lowly. “You always have something to say to me.”

She looked up at him, meeting his gaze head-on. “Fine. Then I’ll say this—you’re insufferable.”

Draco smirked, unbothered. “And yet, here we are. Together. Again.”

Before she could come up with a retort, he plucked the book from her hands and tossed it onto the couch. “Enough distractions. I want your full attention.”

Her heart pounded as he leaned in, his breath warm against her skin. “And I always get what I want.”

Y/N’s jaw tightened. “That’s your problem, Malfoy. You think you can take whatever you want, and the world will just hand it to you.”

Draco’s smirk faltered slightly before his eyes narrowed. “You act as if you’re different. As if you’re not standing here, letting me do exactly what I want.”

Y/N scoffed, stepping back to create some distance. “I don’t let you do anything, Draco. I tolerate you. There’s a difference.”

His smirk returned; this time edged with something darker. "Is that so? Then why is it that every time I get close, you never push me away?"

She opened her mouth to argue, but Draco was already closing the space between them again. His fingers brushed against her wrist, feather-light yet possessive.

"Tell me to leave," he murmured, his voice low and dangerous. "Say the words, and I'll walk away."

Y/N swallowed hard. Her pulse hammered against her skin. She wanted to say it—to push him away, to make him stop—but the words refused to form.

Draco's smirk deepened. "That's what I thought."

Frustration flared inside her, burning hotter than the fire behind them. "You think you have everything figured out, don't you?" she snapped. "That you can just—"

Draco's hand caught her chin, tilting it up slightly. "I don't think, love. I know."

A sharp breath left her lips as his grip tightened—just enough to remind her who was in control.

"You don't control me, Malfoy," she hissed, refusing to back down.

His silver eyes gleamed with amusement. "Not yet."

The heat between them crackled like the fire behind them, an unspoken battle of wills waging in the silence. Y/N hated the way he could unravel her with a single look, the way his words could make her heart race against her better judgment.

But what she hated even more was the undeniable truth in his gaze.

This wasn't over.

Not even close.

Chapter 7: Dangerous Temptations

The firelight flickered wildly, casting golden hues across Draco's sharp features. He hadn't moved from where he stood, his presence looming over Y/N as the tension crackled between them like an untamed storm.

For a moment, neither of them spoke. The silence was heavy, thick with unspoken words and dangerous desires. Then, Draco let out a low chuckle, his fingers grazing her wrist again, this time more deliberately, more controlled.

"You're quieter than usual," he murmured, tilting his head slightly. "Did I finally manage to steal that sharp tongue of yours, love?"

Y/N scoffed, jerking her wrist away—but not before Draco noticed the way her breath hitched at his touch. "Hardly. I was just thinking about how I've had more engaging conversations with—" she trailed off, eyes flicking up toward him with a taunting glint, "—Theodore Nott."

Something dark flickered in Draco's expression, his smirk vanishing in an instant. "What?"

Y/N shrugged, feigning innocence. "Oh, nothing. It's just that Theo actually listens when people talk. And he doesn't go around assuming he owns everything he touches."

Draco's jaw clenched, his fingers tightening at his sides. "You think Nott is any different? You think he isn't looking at you the same way I do?"

She raised an eyebrow, her lips curling into a slow smirk. "Would that bother you, Malfoy?"

Draco took a step closer, his body a breath away from hers. His silver eyes were burning now, a cold fire that sent a shiver down her spine. "You're playing a dangerous game, sweetheart."

Y/N tilted her head, deliberately pushing him further. "Am I? Or do you just hate the idea of someone else wanting me the way you do?"

His hand shot up, fingers curling under her chin with a controlled force—not rough, but firm, demanding her attention. His voice was lower now, almost a growl. "No one wants you the way I do. No one ever will."

Her breath hitched as he leaned in, his lips just barely grazing her ear. "And if you think I'll stand by and let you entertain the idea of someone else, you don't know me at all."

Y/N's pulse pounded against her skin, the air between them suffocatingly thick. Her resolve wavered for a moment, but she managed to whisper, "Sounds a lot like jealousy, Malfoy."

Draco exhaled sharply, his grip tightening just slightly. "Call it what you want," he murmured, his lips brushing her jawline in a featherlight touch. "But don't ever test me on it again."

The room felt smaller, the space between them non-existent. Y/N swallowed, forcing herself to meet his gaze. She should have been afraid—of the way he looked at her, of the possessive edge in his voice—but all she felt was heat. A dizzying, intoxicating heat that threatened to consume them both.

Draco smirked, sensing her hesitation. He loosened his grip, but his fingers trailed down her arm before he pulled away entirely, leaving behind a trail of fire in their wake.

"This isn't over," he murmured, his voice dripping with promise.

Y/N exhaled sharply as he turned and walked away, leaving her heart pounding and her mind reeling.

This was far from over. If anything, it was only just beginning.

Chapter 8: Unravelling Desire

The common room was eerily silent, the only sound the crackling fire that cast shadows across the walls. Y/N's thoughts were a tangled mess, a constant swirl of emotions, none of them calm. Draco had managed to worm his way under her skin, and now every time she closed her eyes, it was his face that haunted her—his smirk, his touch, that dangerous glint in his eyes.

She had tried to distance herself, tried to block out the overwhelming pull he had on her, but she could feel herself breaking with each passing second. This wasn't just desire; it was something darker, something she couldn't explain or fight.

As she sat by the fire, her mind racing, the door to the common room creaked open. She barely had time to process the sound before she felt it—the electric charge of his presence. He didn't need to say anything for her to know he was there. His energy was unmistakable, suffocating, like the calm before a storm.

Y/N's breath hitched as Draco stepped into the flickering light. His pale, chiselled features were set in a cold mask, but there was something beneath that—something wild, something possessive.

"You've been avoiding me," Draco's voice was low, but each syllable landed like a punch to her chest. He took slow, deliberate steps toward her, his gaze never leaving her face.

"I haven't been avoiding you," Y/N tried to say, but even to her own ears, it sounded weak, defensive. She could feel her pulse quicken under his gaze.

He stopped in front of her, standing so close she could feel the heat radiating from his body. His eyes darkened, his breath shallow. "Don't lie to me, Y/N. I know you're pulling away. I can see it in your eyes, in the way your body reacts when I'm near you. You're scared, but you're also desperate."

Her throat tightened at his words. It wasn't just a matter of being afraid of him—it was fear of how he made her feel. She had never been so torn between wanting someone and fearing what that desire might cost her.

Before she could speak, Draco's hand shot out, gripping her chin with a force that made her heart leap in her chest. His touch was possessive, demanding. "Look at me," he growled, forcing her to meet his gaze.

She couldn't look away. His eyes were cold, calculating, but there was a fire beneath the surface—a fire that mirrored the burning tension between them. Her breath came out in shallow gasps as he leaned in closer, his lips brushing the shell of her ear. His voice was a dangerous whisper. "You think you can resist me, but you can't. You're mine, Y/N. Don't forget that."

His words were a warning and a promise all at once. And just as she was about to protest, his lips crashed against hers, silencing her.

There was no gentleness in the kiss. It was rough, possessive, as if he were claiming her all over again. His hands roamed, pulling her closer, pressing her body against his as though he couldn't get close enough. She could feel the heat of his body seeping into hers, the intensity of his desire wrapping around her like a vice.

Y/N's hands went to his chest, but they weren't pushing him away. Instead, her fingers curled into the fabric of his robes, pulling him closer. She hated how much she wanted him, how much she craved the feeling of his lips on hers, the way he made her lose herself entirely.

Draco pulled away for a moment, his forehead resting against hers, his breath ragged. "You don't get to walk away from me, Y/N. Not now. Not ever."

She swallowed hard, her heart hammering in her chest. "Draco, this isn't—"

"Don't," he cut her off, his voice low and rough with barely contained hunger. "Don't even try to tell me what this isn't. You know exactly what this is. You've known since the first time I laid eyes on you."

His lips found hers again, this time with a hunger that bordered on desperate. His hands roamed over her body, possessive, demanding, as if he was imprinting himself on her very skin. Y/N could barely breathe under the intensity of it all, her mind spinning, every inch of her body screaming for more.

Draco pulled back, his eyes blazing with something primal, something that made her pulse race. "You want me just as much as I want you," he whispered, his lips brushing against her jaw. "Don't fight it. You're mine, and you'll never be able to escape that."

The words hit her like a punch to the gut, a declaration that echoed in every part of her being. There was no escape, no turning back. She was trapped—trapped in his world, in his arms, in the fire he had lit in her.

And deep down, she didn't know if she wanted to escape.

Chapter 9: Desire Unleashed

The castle was quiet, save for the faint rustle of the wind outside. Inside, the corridors felt colder, emptier. But in Draco's world, there was only heat—only fire that threatened to consume everything in its path.

Y/N's scent lingered in the air like an intoxicating perfume, haunting him. It was becoming unbearable. The way she looked at him, like she wanted to run, but at the same time, like she was tethered to him by something stronger than her willpower. He couldn't let her slip away—not now, not after everything. He wasn't going to lose control again.

He found her in the library, her figure hunched over a book, her brow furrowed in concentration. But even from a distance, Draco could see the tension in her shoulders, the way she bit her lip as if trying to fight something inside of her. It was too much to ignore.

Without a word, he walked up behind her, his presence so overwhelming that she froze the moment he was near. He knew she could feel him, just like he could feel her. The air between them was charged, electric, as if every inch of space was a battleground.

"Reading, are we?" Draco's voice was low, his words a soft threat that sent shivers down her spine.

Y/N looked up, her eyes meeting his for a brief moment before she quickly glanced away. "I'm trying to focus," she muttered, but her voice lacked conviction.

"Trying to escape me, Y/N?" Draco's voice was dangerous now, the subtle threat unmistakable. He leaned in closer, his breath brushing against her ear as he spoke. "You know that won't work. I always find you."

She didn't respond, but Draco could see the way her chest rose and fell, the way her body reacted to him. She was fighting it, he could tell. But fighting him only made it worse for her.

He placed a hand on the back of her chair, leaning down so that his lips were just inches from her ear. "You're playing a dangerous game," he whispered, his voice smooth, seductive. "I don't play by the rules. Not when it comes to you."

Y/N's breath hitched, her fingers gripping the edge of the book tighter. She was trying to keep her composure, but Draco could see it. The way her body trembled under his touch, the way her pulse quickened at his words.

Draco's fingers trailed down the side of the chair, grazing the fabric where her hand rested. "You think you can hide from me?" he asked, his voice dangerously close to a growl now. "You think you can just walk away and forget what we are?"

Y/N's eyes flickered up to meet his again, and Draco saw the uncertainty in her gaze—the hesitation. But there was something else, something darker. It was desire. It was fear. It was the same damn thing that was tearing him apart.

Without giving her a chance to respond, Draco gripped the back of her chair, his other hand curling around her wrist. "I don't want you to resist anymore," he murmured, his lips grazing the side of her neck, sending a shiver of electricity down her spine. "I want you to feel this. All of it. You can't fight it. Not anymore."

She gasped, the soft sound escaping her lips only fuelling the fire that burned inside of him. Draco pulled her back against him, her body pressed against his, her back to his chest. His hands were everywhere, touching, claiming, taking. He wasn't going to let her go—not now, not ever.

"Draco," she whispered his name, but it wasn't a protest. No, it was something else. It was a plea.

"Don't you dare say my name like that," he growled, his voice thick with need. "You belong to me, Y/N. You've always belonged to me."

The intensity of his words, the heat in his touch, made her feel like she was drowning. She was lost in him—completely and utterly lost. And she couldn't help but crave it.

Draco's lips were on her neck again, his hands moving to grip her waist, pulling her closer. She could feel the tension building between them, the electricity sparking with every touch. He was a storm, and she was trapped in the eye of it.

"I want you to understand something, Y/N," he whispered, his lips brushing against her skin. "There's no escaping this. You're mine, body and soul. And I'm going to make sure you remember that. Every second of every day."

Her heart raced, her body trembling under the weight of his words. She was so close to breaking, so close to giving in to him completely. But even in the midst of it all, a part of her was still afraid—afraid of the consequences, afraid of what this dangerous game would cost her.

But Draco wasn't going to give her a choice. Not anymore.

Chapter 10: Sacrifice in Shadows

The dim light of the library flickered as the door creaked open, a subtle sound barely registering against the heavy silence that hung in the air. Y/N and Draco were lost in their world—a world filled with fire, possessiveness, and a growing intensity neither knew how to tame. Yet, unbeknownst to them, they were not as alone as they thought.

Theo Nott stood in the shadows; his gaze fixed on the scene unfolding before him. The air was thick with tension, with emotions neither Draco nor Y/N seemed ready to confront. Theo watched with a mixture of admiration and frustration—the way Draco's icy demeanour cracked and softened around Y/N, the way she resisted, yet couldn't help but fall deeper under his spell. It was both infuriating and oddly beautiful.

He had known for a long time now. The truth was undeniable. His feelings for Draco had evolved from admiration to something more—something that twisted and burned deep in his chest every time he saw him with someone else. But he would never voice it. Not to Draco. Not to anyone. Because Theo knew better than to fight a battle he could never win.

But despite the pain, despite the jealousy that gnawed at his insides, there was a deeper part of him—something unspoken, something loyal—that wanted Draco and Y/N to be together. He could see it. He could feel it. And if helping them meant sacrificing his own desires, then so be it.

He stepped forward, careful not to make a sound, his presence unnoticed by both of them, lost in their own game of proximity and restraint. But it wasn't unnoticed by Draco.

The Slytherin's eyes flickered to the shadows, his gaze sharp, always calculating, always observant. The moment their eyes met; Theo knew Draco saw him. And Draco, being Draco, wasn't one to let anything slide by unnoticed. His lips curled into a faint smirk, a challenge, an invitation.

"Did you need something, Nott?" Draco's voice was low, tinged with annoyance, but there was also something else—curiosity. As if he already knew Theo was up to something, but couldn't yet figure out exactly what.

Theo stepped into the flickering light, his eyes flicking briefly to Y/N, whose focus was still caught on Draco, unaware of the conversation unfolding just behind her. She had no idea of the storm brewing in the corners of the room.

"I've got an idea," Theo said, his voice calm, measured. He glanced at Draco, his tone almost a challenge. "A way to make things progress between you two."

Y/N looked up, eyebrows furrowed in confusion. "What are you talking about?"

Theo gave a small shrug, offering her a tight-lipped smile. He didn't want to reveal too much just yet. Not to her. But Draco would understand. He always did. "It's simple, really," he began, his gaze unwavering from Draco's. "You're both circling around each other, playing games. But you're not getting anywhere, not fast enough."

Draco leaned back slightly, intrigued, but his eyes remained guarded. "And your suggestion is?"

Theo's lips curled into a subtle smile, though there was an edge to it—something dark and secretive. "Make her fall for you faster," he said softly, stepping closer to them both. "Push her further, Draco. She's resisting, but she wants this. She's just afraid to admit it."

Y/N's pulse quickened, her eyes flicking between the two boys, confused and unsure of where this conversation was heading. "What exactly are you suggesting?" Her voice was shaky now, the words feeling heavier with each passing moment.

Draco didn't answer right away. He stared at Theo, as if trying to gauge the sincerity of his words. There was something in Theo's eyes, something that spoke volumes. But Draco wasn't ready to admit it. He didn't want to acknowledge the depth of what was being said.

"Don't give me riddles, Nott. What do you mean by 'push her further'?" Draco's voice was cold, his control slipping just a little as the conversation took an unexpected turn.

Theo hesitated, but only for a moment. He'd said it before, in his own mind, hundreds of times. But now, here, in front of Draco and Y/N, the weight of it felt heavier than he had imagined. He looked at Draco with an expression that was almost pleading, though he didn't speak the words aloud. He didn't have to.

"I'll help her fall for you. I'll make sure she's right where you want her to be," Theo said quietly, his gaze shifting briefly to Y/N, who was now more confused than ever. "But, Draco, you've got to promise me one thing."

Draco raised an eyebrow, intrigued and somewhat cautious now. "What?"

Theo's voice softened, but the intensity in it grew. "Don't hurt her. Not in a way she can't recover from."

Y/N's eyes darted between them, the weight of Theo's words settling in. She could feel it now, the undercurrent of something unspoken, something hidden beneath the surface. But she couldn't put her finger on it—couldn't understand why Theo was willing to help, or why his gaze lingered on her with something too deep to decipher.

For a long moment, Draco was silent. His eyes locked with Theo's, calculating, assessing, as if deciding whether to trust him—or if this was all part of some bigger game. But then, finally, his lips curled into that signature smirk, colder than ever.

"I don't need your help, Nott," Draco said, his voice clipped, but there was something more in his words. A recognition. "But I'll take it."

Theo nodded, his heart pounding in his chest as he tried to hide the turmoil inside. He was giving Draco what he wanted, helping him get what he desired. But what was he losing in the process? What part of himself was he giving away just to make sure Draco and Y/N came together?

But for Draco, Theo would sacrifice it all.

Chapter 11: Unspoken Bonds

The night was thick with tension, and Draco's frustration seemed to permeate the very air around him. He hadn't seen Y/N all day—hadn't felt her presence, hadn't heard her laugh, hadn't witnessed the way she so unknowingly drove him insane with every little movement, every little glance. It was suffocating, and Draco hated feeling this way. But it was also intoxicating.

He could hear her voice in his head, see the way her lips moved when she spoke to him, the way she tried to pretend like nothing was happening between them when everything inside him screamed otherwise. He needed to confront her. Needed to know if this feeling—the one that burned through him every time she was near—was something she was feeling too.

Draco had been pacing in the Slytherin common room for hours, his patience wearing thinner with every passing second. His fingers curled into fists, his jaw tight with the need to have her, possess her. She was everything he wanted—and yet, every time she looked at him like she was trying to escape, it only made him want her more.

The Great Hall was alive with chatter, the usual hum of students enjoying their meal. But Draco's eyes were fixed on her, across the room, her back to him, as always, like she had no idea what kind of chaos she was stirring in him just by existing.

Every time Y/N moved, his eyes followed, tracing her every step, her every gesture. She laughed at something someone said, her head thrown back in that effortless way that made Draco's stomach tighten. His pulse quickened, and without thinking, he stood up abruptly. Theo Nott, sitting beside him, barely spared him a glance. He could feel the shift in Draco, the crackling energy that had overtaken him.

"Where are you going?" Theo asked, his voice low, as if he already knew the answer.

Draco's eyes darkened, his lips curling into a cruel smile that didn't reach his eyes. "Where do you think I'm going, Nott?"

Theo's gaze flicked over to where Y/N was sitting, then back at Draco. "She's not going to be easy, Draco."

Draco's smirk only deepened, his voice cold and quiet. "I don't need easy. I need her."

He didn't waste time, didn't care for the stares of students around him as he made his way toward Y/N. She felt his presence before she saw him—there was always that magnetic pull when he was near, like a storm brewing, ready to consume everything in its path.

Her heart skipped a beat as he approached, his gaze never leaving her. She tried to ignore it, tried to focus on the conversation with her friend, but the tension in the air was palpable, thick, suffocating. Her breath caught when he stopped just beside her, standing too close—close enough that the heat of his body was felt, even through the distance they tried to maintain.

"Y/N," Draco's voice was a low, possessive growl, sending a shiver down her spine.

She didn't respond immediately. She couldn't. The words seemed to lodge themselves in her throat, her heartbeat too loud in her ears. She couldn't look at him—not yet, not until she was ready to face whatever it was that had been building between them. But she could feel his eyes on her, could feel the weight of his gaze like a physical touch, burning into her skin.

When she finally turned to face him, she saw that look again. That same hunger, that same possessiveness that had begun to consume her thoughts. She swallowed hard, trying to steady herself. "What do you want, Draco?"

His lips curled into a smirk, but it was darker, more dangerous this time. "You."

The word was like a spark, lighting a fire between them. His eyes flicked down to her lips, and for a moment, everything else disappeared. She was the only thing that mattered in that moment, her proximity driving him insane.

"You don't get to do this," she whispered, though her voice shook, betraying her.

Draco stepped closer, his body almost brushing hers. "I don't have to get permission from you, Y/N. I don't need your approval." His voice dropped, dark and dangerous. "I'm taking you. Whether you like it or not."

Y/N's breath hitched, but she forced herself to hold his gaze. "You think you can control me, Draco? You think you can just walk up to me and make me feel what you want me to feel?"

He didn't say a word in response. Instead, he reached out, his hand brushing against hers, a touch so light yet electrifying that it made her heart race. She tried to pull away, but he caught her wrist, pulling her closer, until the space between them had vanished completely.

Draco's fingers wrapped around her wrist, tightening just enough to let her know he was in control. His voice was soft, almost too soft, as he whispered against her ear. "I don't need you to admit it, Y/N. You want me just as badly as I want you. And I'll make you admit it."

Her chest rose and fell rapidly, the fight inside her beginning to wane. She tried to look away, but her eyes betrayed her, flicking up to meet his. He was watching her closely, studying her reaction like it was a game, like he was savouring every little moment of this power struggle between them.

"Let go," she breathed out, though her voice was laced with the uncertainty she couldn't hide.

But Draco didn't let go. Instead, his grip on her tightened, pulling her even closer until they were standing chest to chest. His breath was warm against her lips, his scent intoxicating, drawing her in. And when he leaned in, just a fraction of an inch from her lips, she felt it—the unmistakable heat, the pull, the force that had been building between them for weeks.

And that was when she realized. She was losing. Losing herself to him. To the chaos he brought with him. To the need. The desire. The power he had over her.

Before she could stop herself, her lips parted, and Draco took that as his signal. He captured her mouth in a kiss that was nothing short of consuming. His lips were urgent, hungry, and possessive, as if he wanted to carve himself into her very soul. And Y/N—helpless, weak under the intensity of his touch—responded. She couldn't help it. She was falling.

Theo stood just outside the courtyard, watching from the shadows as Draco pressed Y/N against the stone wall, his hands tangled in her hair, his kiss bruising and demanding. His stomach churned with a mix of jealousy and something deeper—something darker that he wasn't ready to acknowledge.

He had promised himself this was what he wanted. He had promised himself that helping Draco get Y/N was the right thing to do. But watching them now, Theo felt his heart shatter, piece by piece.

Draco had her. He always would.

And Theo—Theo had nothing.

Chapter 12: The Ties That Bind

The dungeon was silent, save for the faint rustling of robes and the crackling of distant torches. Draco's gaze was fixed on Y/N, and she could feel the weight of it, like an invisible force pulling her in. It had been days since that kiss, days since they had crossed that line, and every time she tried to put some distance between them, the gravity of Draco's presence reeled her back in.

Tonight, there was no escape.

His voice, dark and intoxicating, broke the silence. "I've waited long enough."

Y/N turned to face him, but before she could say anything, Draco was already closing the distance between them. His hand shot out, grabbing her wrist with a fierce possessiveness that made her breath hitch.

"You can't keep pretending this isn't happening," Draco said, his voice low, raw with need. His other hand slid up to her neck, gently tilting her chin so she had no choice but to meet his gaze. His eyes were intense, burning with a hunger that sent a chill down her spine.

"I'm not pretending," she breathed, her voice shaking. Her mind screamed at her to pull away, to maintain some distance, but her body betrayed her. She wanted him. She needed him.

"You can lie to yourself all you want, but I know the truth," Draco murmured, stepping closer, his chest nearly brushing hers. "You want me. And the sooner you admit it, the sooner we can stop playing these games."

Her heart raced as she felt the heat radiating from him. His proximity, his touch, were like flames, and she was already starting to burn. She opened her mouth to respond, but no words came. Draco took that as his cue.

He pulled her into him with a brutal force, his lips crashing against hers with a raw urgency. The kiss was demanding, possessive—one that made it clear she was no longer just a girl he liked. She was his.

Y/N's hands, trembling, found their way to his chest, her fingers digging into the fabric of his shirt, pulling him closer, if that was even possible. Every inch of her body screamed for him, every nerve on fire. But in the back of her mind, there was a whisper, a reminder that this was dangerous—that giving in to him might break her in ways she couldn't predict.

But when Draco's lips trailed down her neck, his breath hot against her skin, that whisper was drowned out by the sheer intensity of the moment. He wasn't asking for permission anymore. He was taking.

"Say it," he growled against her skin, his teeth grazing her neck as his hands roamed, each touch sending jolts of electricity through her.

"Say what?" Y/N gasped, barely able to think as his lips worked their magic on her.

"That you're mine," Draco demanded, his voice dark and possessive. "Say it, Y/N."

For a moment, everything inside her screamed to pull away. But her body was no longer hers to control. The way Draco held her, the way he made her feel... it was like being caught in a spell, one that she was powerless to break.

"You're mine," she whispered, her voice barely audible, but enough to make Draco smirk in satisfaction.

He pulled back slightly, just enough to look her in the eyes. His expression was triumphant, as though he had just conquered something deep inside her. And in a way, he had.

"You're mine, and I'm not letting you go," he said softly, but there was no mistaking the finality in his tone.

Meanwhile, in the dimly lit corridors of the castle, Theo walked alone, his thoughts heavy with everything that had transpired over the past few weeks. He had always known that helping Draco with Y/N was a mistake, but now, it felt like he was watching something unravel that he couldn't control. It was worse than he'd imagined.

He wasn't angry with Draco—he never could be. But seeing Y/N with Draco, seeing how much control he had over her, how much she needed him, it was suffocating.

Theo's steps faltered when he saw someone standing ahead. Vincent. There was something about the way Vincent had been looking at him lately—something that sent an uneasy feeling crawling up Theo's spine.

"Do you need something, Vincent?" Theo asked, trying to keep his voice steady.

Vincent smirked; his eyes gleaming with something unreadable. "Actually, yes. I've been watching you, Theo."

Theo raised an eyebrow. "Watching me? Why?"

Vincent took a step closer, his voice dropping to a low whisper. "Because I know what it's like. Wanting someone you can't have. Wanting to protect them but knowing they'll never be yours."

Theo stiffened, unsure of where this conversation was headed. “What are you talking about?”

Vincent smirked again, but this time it was softer, more genuine. “I know what it’s like to love someone who doesn’t love you back. It’s painful. But I also know what it’s like to want someone—really want them—and not let anyone else get in the way of that.”

Theo’s heart skipped a beat, but he quickly shook his head. “I’m not like Draco. I’m not...”

Vincent placed a hand on Theo’s shoulder, his touch gentle but firm. “No, you’re not. But I’m offering you something he can’t give you. Something real.”

Theo stared at Vincent, his mind racing. For the first time, he saw the glimmer of something more in Vincent’s eyes. Not the cold indifference he was used to, but something deeper, something vulnerable.

“You’re not alone, Theo,” Vincent continued, his voice soft, almost tender. “I see you. I know what you want. And I’m here for you.”

Theo swallowed hard, feeling a lump form in his throat. He had always been the quiet observer, the one who helped from the shadows. But now, he wasn’t so sure he could keep watching from the sidelines anymore.

“I’m not... ready,” Theo muttered, his voice thick with emotion.

Vincent’s hand squeezed his shoulder, a silent promise. “Whenever you are, Theo. I’ll be here.”

Back in the dungeon, Y/N stood frozen, her thoughts scattered, her body still humming from the intensity of Draco’s touch. The kiss, the way he had taken control—it was all too much, too fast. But she couldn’t deny the way he made her feel.

As Draco watched her, something flickered in his eyes—something dark, something possessive. “Don’t think about running away,” he said, his voice barely a whisper, yet it felt like a command.

“I’m not running,” she replied, her voice shaky but determined.

“You will,” Draco murmured. “And when you do, I’ll be right behind you.”

Chapter 13: Realization and Claim

The days following that intense encounter with Draco were a blur. Y/N tried to push it all to the back of her mind, but it was impossible. Every time she closed her eyes, she saw his face—his dark, possessive eyes, his touch that left her breathless, his voice that seemed to sink under her skin and make her crave him even more.

It was the way he looked at her that haunted her. The way his gaze held her in place, made her feel like she was the only person in the room, as though she were the one thing in his world worth paying attention to. But at the same time, it made her nervous. Because it wasn’t just desire in his eyes—it was something darker, something possessive. And that scared her more than anything.

But what scared her even more was that she didn’t mind it.

It happened one afternoon, in the middle of one of those slow, lazy days at Hogwarts. The common room was half-empty, and Y/N was sitting by the fire, trying to focus on her studies, but all she could think about was him.

Draco.

The sound of voices nearby interrupted her thoughts. She glanced up to see a few students gathered by the door, including one of Draco's close friends, Blaise, talking animatedly with a group of girls. One of them—her name was Pansy—was laughing loudly, her hand resting casually on Draco's shoulder.

Y/N's heart clenched, and she tried to look away, focusing back on the book in front of her. But something inside her wouldn't let her. She couldn't take her eyes off the scene. Pansy's hand on Draco's shoulder, the way she leaned in close, her giggles ringing in the air—everything about it sent a sharp, painful twist through Y/N's chest.

She hated it.

No, scratch that—she despised it.

The jealousy burned, but she didn't know what to do with it. She didn't understand it. Why did she care if Draco was talking to other girls? Why did it feel like her chest was going to explode just watching them?

And then, as if sensing her gaze, Draco turned his head. His eyes locked onto hers instantly, the smirk that formed on his lips sending a jolt straight to her core. He didn't even look away from her as Pansy continued to laugh, oblivious to the tension in the air. Draco didn't seem to care. He was focused entirely on Y/N.

And that, more than anything, made her heart skip a beat.

After that day, it was like something inside her shifted. The jealousy, the possessiveness—it was all there, simmering beneath the surface. And the more she tried to ignore it, the stronger it became.

Draco had noticed, of course. It was impossible not to. He wasn't blind. The way Y/N's eyes would narrow whenever another girl spoke to him, the way she seemed to watch him more intently than before—he could see it all. And it amused him. He had always known that she cared, but seeing it manifest in her eyes? That was new. It was exactly what he wanted.

He wasn't one to hide his satisfaction, either. So one evening, he made sure to push her buttons.

Y/N was walking through the corridor when she heard voices up ahead. The unmistakable laughter of Draco and his friends drifted through the air, and instinctively, she felt her stomach tighten. She wasn't sure why, but she needed to get closer. She needed to see them.

As she rounded the corner, she saw Draco standing with a group of students, including one of the younger girls from Slytherin who had always seemed to admire Draco from afar. Her name was Isolde, and she was standing just a bit too close to him for Y/N's comfort. Draco didn't seem to mind, laughing with the group, his arm casually draped over her shoulder.

Y/N felt a wave of frustration rush over her. She could feel her pulse quicken, her breath becoming shallow. But instead of walking away, she found herself walking closer, her steps deliberate, her presence like a silent challenge.

Draco spotted her immediately, his eyes lighting up with a wicked grin. "Y/N," he called out, his voice smooth and low, as if he were daring her to make a move.

Isolde, noticing the tension between them, smiled innocently, though there was a hint of something more in her eyes. "Oh, Draco, you must be so busy. You should really talk to Y/N more often. She looks like she needs some attention."

Y/N's stomach churned, but she didn't show it. She squared her shoulders, walking right up to Draco and brushing past Isolde. "I'm fine," Y/N said, her voice cool, but it held a dangerous edge. "I don't need anyone to look after me."

Draco raised an eyebrow, intrigued by the sudden shift in her demeanour. "Is that so?" His voice was low, but there was an unmistakable challenge in it.

Y/N stood there for a moment, her eyes locked with his, feeling something dark and possessive stir inside her. "Maybe I don't need anyone... except you," she said, her voice a whisper that only Draco could hear, but her words were enough to make him freeze.

The way she said it—except you—it wasn't just a statement. It was a claim.

Draco smirked, the spark of approval lighting up his eyes. "I knew it," he murmured, his voice dripping with satisfaction. "You want me, don't you?"

Y/N didn't answer immediately. Instead, she walked closer to him, her body brushing against his as she placed a hand on his chest, pushing him back lightly. "I don't want to share you, Draco," she said, the possessiveness in her voice unmistakable.

Draco's smirk widened, his fingers curling around her wrist as he leaned in, his breath ghosting over her ear. "I've been waiting for you to say that."

The tension in the air was thick, almost palpable. Y/N could feel herself falling deeper, but she didn't care. She was no longer the unsure girl who had tried to keep her distance. She was his. And she wasn't about to let anyone else get in the way of that.

Draco was no longer the only one who could claim her. She was claiming him too.

Chapter 14: The Dark Game

The Great Hall was unusually noisy, the air thick with chatter as students gathered around for dinner. Y/N sat at the far edge of the Slytherin table, trying to focus on her plate but failing miserably. Draco was seated at the other end, talking animatedly with Pansy, his laughter echoing through the room.

Y/N's eyes flicked between them, a tight knot forming in her stomach. Pansy was leaning in too close, her hand resting casually on Draco's arm, her laugh too soft and inviting. Every time Pansy's fingers grazed his skin, it felt like someone was stabbing Y/N in the chest with a hot knife.

What the hell is going on?

Draco had always been flirtatious, but this? This felt different. It was as though he was intentionally pushing her buttons, playing a game she wasn't sure she wanted to be a part of. But, damn it, it was working. Y/N was feeling something, and it wasn't just anger. It was... jealousy. But why?

"Y/N, don't you want to join us?" Pansy's voice cut through her thoughts. "Draco and I were just talking about the Quidditch match. You're always so serious, love. Don't you ever just relax?"

Y/N glanced up sharply. Pansy's playful tone only fueled the fire inside her.

"I'm fine," Y/N muttered, her gaze never leaving Draco. "You and Draco have a lot to talk about, don't you?"

Draco's lips curved into an insufferably smug grin. He leaned back in his chair, a dark amusement flickering in his eyes as he caught Y/N's eye across the table. He didn't even try to hide the way his gaze lingered on her, knowing exactly what he was doing to her.

"Well, it's just that we've been catching up," Draco said, his voice dripping with that unmistakable malice, the words sent straight at her. "You know, Y/N... you've been so distant lately. I thought I'd find some companionship elsewhere, since you seem to be... preoccupied."

Y/N's blood ran cold. He couldn't be serious. He was doing this deliberately. What game was he playing?

"Distant?" Y/N whispered under her breath, but Draco was already turning his attention back to Pansy, laughing like it was the funniest thing in the world.

She felt the sting of something deep inside her. Why does it matter so much?

Her mind was racing. She couldn't stand it anymore. She couldn't let this go. If Draco was going to play these games, then so was she.

Later that evening, as they walked back to the Slytherin common room, Draco was still riding the high of his little performance. His eyes flicked to Y/N as she walked beside him, arms crossed tightly. He could feel her discomfort, her annoyance. And that only made him want to push harder.

"So," Draco began casually, "are you going to tell me what's got you all worked up, or are we going to keep playing the quiet game?"

Y/N's eyes narrowed. "Is this what you wanted, Draco? To make me jealous? To make me think you're off having fun with Pansy and God knows who else?"

Draco stopped walking; his expression unreadable. He was enjoying this—way too much.

"Is that what you think?" His voice was low, dangerously calm. "You think I care about Pansy?"

Y/N flinched, not expecting him to snap back so sharply.

"Then why the hell are you encouraging her?" she shot back. "Why her, Draco? Of all people?"

Draco leaned in, his lips curling into a sinister smirk. He was so close now, so close that she could feel his breath against her skin. "Because I like seeing how you react, Y/N. I like seeing you lose control. You don't get to hide behind your indifference anymore. It's... amusing."

Y/N stood frozen, her breath hitching in her throat. She was furious, her mind was a whirlwind of conflicting emotions, but there was something else—something she couldn't deny.

Was he... enjoying this?

Her jealousy, her rage—it was exactly what Draco wanted. And that pissed her off more than anything.

But before she could respond, a figure appeared from the shadows—a third-year Slytherin boy, nervous and out of place. He looked between them, clearing his throat.

"Uh, Draco... Y/N?" the boy said awkwardly. "I... I need to speak with you both. It's urgent."

Draco shot him a glare that could have melted ice. "What is it, Finn?"

The boy hesitated. "It's about the match tomorrow. There's a... situation with some Gryffindor students. They're planning something, and I thought you'd want to know."

Y/N rolled her eyes, annoyed at the interruption. But Draco seemed interested.

"Fine. Go on." Draco's voice was suddenly colder, the playful spark gone.

As Finn babbled about some Gryffindor prank, Draco's eyes never left Y/N's. He was still enjoying this, watching her every reaction, feeding off her emotions.

The next day, as they made their way to the Quidditch pitch, Y/N felt a heavy silence between them. It was as if the game had taken a turn, one neither of them expected.

She tried to push him out of her mind, but the burning jealousy was still there. Draco had been talking to other girls again, making sure she noticed—especially when it came to Isolde, the younger Slytherin who had developed quite the interest in him.

At one point, she watched Draco and Isolde laughing, Draco's arm casually draped over her shoulder. That was it. Y/N couldn't take it anymore.

Without thinking, she stormed up to them, pushing through the group of students with a wild, reckless energy.

"Draco," she snapped, voice shaking. "Do you have to flirt with every girl that crosses your path?"

Draco's eyes sparkled with dark amusement. "And what if I do?"

Before Y/N could say anything, Isolde, who had been standing too close, giggled, "Oh, Y/N, don't worry. Draco was just being friendly."

Y/N could feel the heat rising in her cheeks. "I'm sure," she muttered sarcastically, glaring at both of them. But before she could storm off, Draco caught her wrist, yanking her back toward him.

"You can't keep running away from this," Draco growled, his tone low and dangerous. "You can't keep pretending like you don't care. You're jealous, Y/N. And I'm going to make sure you know it."

Y/N's heart pounded in her chest, the fire within her burning brighter than ever. She yanked her wrist out of his grasp, meeting his gaze head-on. "You're playing with fire, Draco. You think you can just make me feel like this and get away with it?"

Draco smirked, his hand reaching up to caress her cheek in a slow, deliberate motion. "What if I want you to burn for me, Y/N?"

The intensity was escalating now—this wasn't just a game anymore. Y/N was no longer the naive girl trying to keep her distance. She was becoming something else. Something darker. And Draco? He wasn't backing down.

But neither was she.

Chapter 15: The Flames of Possession

The day was dimming, and the air felt heavy with anticipation. Draco was already standing near the Slytherin common room, his back to the wall, watching the students pass by with a knowing smirk.

He had planned every moment of this game meticulously, and now, things were about to come to a head.

Y/N hadn't spoken to him since the confrontation on the Quidditch pitch. She had avoided him all day, making a point of sitting on the other side of the hall, walking away from him whenever they crossed paths. And Draco could tell—it was working.

Her anger, her jealousy—it was all a delicious mix that only heightened his desire to push her further. But Draco was getting impatient. The longer Y/N played hard to get, the more he wanted her. And it was time he showed her exactly how far he was willing to go to claim her.

As the evening descended, Y/N found herself alone in the library. She had been trying to focus on her studies, but the images of Draco with Isolde, Pansy, and any number of girls haunted her thoughts. The way he had touched them, laughed with them, looked at them... it was maddening. The jealousy surged within her again, but she quickly shoved it down. You won't let him control you like this. You won't.

Suddenly, she felt a chill sweep through the library. She looked up and found none other than Draco Malfoy leaning casually against one of the bookshelves, his cold blue eyes locking with hers.

"You've been avoiding me, Y/N," Draco's voice was smooth, yet there was an undeniable edge to it. "That's cute."

Y/N didn't respond immediately. She forced herself to remain composed, though her heartbeat was picking up its pace. "What do you want, Draco?" she asked, keeping her voice steady.

Draco took a few steps toward her, his presence a storm that swept through the otherwise quiet space. "Oh, I think you know exactly what I want."

Y/N's breath hitched in her throat. She backed up, but there was nowhere to go. The wall was just behind her, and Draco was closing in. His gaze never wavered, like a predator who knew its prey.

"Do you think I'm going to stop? That I'll give up this game because you pretend not to care?" Draco's voice was low, a dangerous growl slipping through the calm exterior.

She swallowed hard, refusing to back down. "You think this is a game?"

Draco's lips curled into a dark, amused smile. "Oh, it's more than a game, Y/N. This is mine to play with now."

Before she could respond, Draco was suddenly right in front of her, his body dangerously close. His hand reached up to trace the side of her cheek, sending a shock of electricity through her body. "You're mine, whether you like it or not," he whispered.

Y/N's pulse quickened. She was angry. She was confused. But most of all, she was pulled—pulled into his orbit like she couldn't stop it, like she didn't want to stop it. The intensity of his presence was suffocating, overwhelming.

"No," she breathed out, shaking her head slightly. "I'm not yours."

Draco chuckled darkly. "You say that now, but you'll see. The more you fight it, the worse it'll be for you. I'll make you burn for it, Y/N."

Her breath caught in her throat as Draco's fingers slid down her neck, a soft caress that had her heart thundering in her chest. His eyes were filled with something darker now—possessiveness. Something far deeper than mere teasing.

"Stop, Draco," Y/N tried to say, but her voice faltered. What was wrong with her? Why was she not pulling away? Why was her body betraying her?

"You don't mean that," Draco whispered, his lips grazing her ear. He could feel her pulse, quick and erratic, beneath her skin. "I know what you want, Y/N. I can see it in your eyes every time you look at me. You're burning for me."

"Shut up," she snapped, though her words lacked the bite they usually had. The closeness, the heat between them was too much. She had to pull away, but she couldn't.

Draco leaned in further, his lips hovering just over hers. "Say it, Y/N. Admit it."

Her breath was coming in shallow gasps now, and Y/N closed her eyes, fighting the sensation that was rapidly taking over her.

"I—" she tried to speak, but Draco was already kissing her before the words could escape.

The kiss was forceful, hungry. It wasn't gentle or soft. It was driven, as if he were marking her, claiming her in ways that words never could. Her body responded instantly, her hands fisting the front of his robes, pulling him closer as though she could never get close enough.

It was only when they finally pulled apart, both breathless and heated, that Y/N realized she was trembling. She could feel the burning need within her—desire that had been buried for so long, now awakened by Draco's dominance.

She wanted to scream at herself for letting him do this to her. For letting him break down the walls she'd worked so hard to build.

But Draco wasn't done. He kissed her again, this time softer, more teasing, his lips barely brushing against hers as he whispered, "I'm not done with you, Y/N. You'll learn to crave me. You'll crave everything about me."

Y/N stepped back, trying to regain some sense of control, but Draco just watched her with that damned smirk on his face. He was savouring every second, every reaction she gave him.

Just then, the door to the library creaked open. A voice broke the intense silence. "Draco? Y/N?"

It was Theo.

Y/N's eyes widened in panic. She hadn't even heard him approach. Draco's smirk never faltered. In fact, it only grew. He wasn't worried at all. Instead, he turned to Theo, his tone suddenly shifting into something more casual.

"Hey, Theo," Draco greeted, his hand resting on the small of Y/N's back, possessively pulling her closer. "What's up?"

Theo, clearly a little uncomfortable with the situation, raised an eyebrow. "I was looking for you two. I heard something about the Gryffindor prank plan... I—" He stopped mid-sentence, eyes flicking between Draco and Y/N. "Oh... am I interrupting something?"

Draco gave a mock sigh, releasing Y/N from his grip but keeping his hand hovering dangerously close to her. "Don't worry, Theo. Just a little... misunderstanding."

Y/N's heart was racing. She wanted to push Draco away, to shout at him, but her body was still reeling from what had just happened. Theo was staring at them, clearly understanding that something more was going on, but he said nothing.

Finally, Y/N broke the silence. "We were talking about the prank. What's going on?" she asked, trying to regain some composure.

Theo hesitated, his eyes flicking to Draco before returning to her. "I—I'll tell you later," he muttered before quickly exiting the library.

As the door closed behind him, Draco stepped closer to Y/N once more, his voice dangerously low. "You're mine now, Y/N. You can't run away from it."

Y/N's chest tightened. She couldn't deny it any longer.

"You don't get to own me, Draco."

"Oh, but I already do."

Chapter 16: Gryffindor's Grand Prank

The next day, the tension between Draco and Y/N seemed to have simmered down a bit. There was still that undercurrent of heat whenever their eyes met, but it was easier to breathe around each other now. Draco, as usual, leaned against the wall of the Slytherin common room, his ever-present smirk in place, while Y/N was trying to focus on something that wasn't him.

"I'm bored," Draco suddenly declared, pushing himself off the wall and walking over to her. "Let's go do something fun."

Y/N raised an eyebrow. "Fun? You?"

Draco shrugged. "I have my moments. Besides, you need to relax. Don't think too much about everything that's happened."

Before Y/N could retort, a loud crash echoed from the hallway. She frowned, standing up. "What was that?"

Draco's smirk widened. "Sounds like trouble. Shall we investigate?"

The two of them made their way toward the noise, only to be greeted by the sight of a very irate Professor Snape, standing in front of a group of Gryffindor students who were absolutely not supposed to be there.

"You," Snape barked, pointing at Ron Weasley, who was grinning sheepishly. "Explain why your 'experiment' has caused a massive explosion in the courtyard."

Ron, looking entirely too proud of himself, opened his mouth but was cut off by Hermione Granger. "It was supposed to be a harmless prank! Honestly, Professor, the Weasley twins gave him the wrong potion! I don't know how it turned into an explosion."

Draco looked at Y/N with a raised eyebrow. "This ought to be good."

The sight before them was nothing short of chaos. The courtyard was covered in bright pink bubbles—giant ones, small ones, some even floating above their heads. And the worst part? The bubbles weren't just colourful. Every time someone popped one, a loud, obnoxious noise echoed. Think of a kazoo playing the most annoying tune on loop.

Snape's face was beet-red with fury, his nostrils flaring as the bubbles kept multiplying around him. "This was your idea, Weasley?" Snape's voice was a low growl, barely holding onto the last remnants of patience.

Ron grinned widely. "It was supposed to be harmless. We wanted to prank Malfoy, but we got... a bit carried away."

At that, Draco stepped forward, trying to contain his laughter. "You did me a favor, Weasley. This is much more fun than I imagined."

Y/N couldn't help but chuckle, watching the chaos unfold. Ron had clearly made a huge mess, but somehow it felt just right. Every time a bubble popped near Snape's face, he would flinch, looking even more annoyed. Y/N was laughing so hard, she was holding her stomach.

Hermione tried to maintain her composure. "I swear, if I have to clean this up—"

"We'll help," Draco offered with a smirk. "After all, Weasley did this in the name of fun."

Snape, however, wasn't in the mood for humour. His icy glare shot around the courtyard. "Everyone, get inside, now. Except for you, Weasley. You stay and clean this up."

Y/N, still holding her stomach from laughing, walked over to Ron and gave him a pat on the back. "Well, it's one way to make an impression. Maybe not the best way, though."

Ron shrugged. "Hey, if I'm gonna go down, it might as well be for something memorable."

Draco, not one to pass up on an opportunity, leaned in closer to Y/N. "You see, now that's the kind of prank I can get behind. Maybe you should prank me next. I mean, I wouldn't mind a little surprise of my own."

Y/N rolled her eyes, but a smile tugged at the corner of her lips. "You're impossible."

"Impossible to resist," Draco said with a grin.

Later that day, the Gryffindor students, minus Ron, who was now drenched in pink bubbles, were all summoned to detention for their unfortunate prank. However, the real entertainment came in the form of Draco, who, despite the fact that he wasn't involved, seemed to be the most entertained by it all.

"I have to admit, watching Weasley clean up after that prank was definitely worth the day," Draco said as he and Y/N sat in a corner of the common room later that evening. "I think I may have to send him a thank-you card."

Y/N laughed, shaking her head. "You are something else."

Draco's eyes flickered with that familiar intensity, but this time, there was something more playful in his gaze. "You know, maybe I should pull a prank of my own. Something... just for you."

Y/N's eyes narrowed in suspicion. "What do you mean?"

“Oh, just a little something to remind you that I’m always on your mind,” Draco said, his voice smooth with mischief. “It’s the least I could do after all the time you’ve been avoiding me.”

“Please, Draco,” Y/N scoffed. “You think I’ve been avoiding you?”

“Well,” Draco paused, glancing at her with a playful glint in his eyes. “You don’t seem to want to admit that you miss me.”

“I don’t miss you,” she shot back, though her tone didn’t hold as much conviction as before.

“Mm-hmm,” Draco said with a teasing grin. “I’ll let you keep telling yourself that. But I think we both know the truth, don’t we?”

Y/N couldn’t stop herself from laughing. Draco had this way of making everything feel so... ridiculous, and yet so irresistible at the same time.

As they spent the rest of the evening together, Draco’s antics lightened the mood. The prank had shifted the atmosphere between them. Y/N wasn’t quite sure what had changed, but it was clear that whatever game they were playing, it was only going to get more entertaining.

The walls they had built up were slowly coming down, brick by brick, until it felt like neither of them knew where the prank ended and their feelings began.

Chapter 17: The Heart’s Little Trick

The days following the Gryffindor prank were a whirlwind of laughter, teasing, and more than a few unspoken feelings floating between Draco and Y/N. It seemed like every time they crossed paths, something light-hearted and yet, undeniably charged, happened.

The walls between them, though still present, had cracks big enough for them to slip through and share small moments of vulnerability. Draco was no longer just the arrogant, posh Slytherin—and Y/N wasn’t just the girl who tried her best to ignore him. They were something else now. Something... unwritten.

One afternoon, as the weather started to get warmer, the two of them found themselves walking side by side through the Hogwarts grounds. The air was filled with the scent of fresh grass, and there was a gentle breeze tousling Y/N’s hair. She had been feeling particularly light that day, the stress of her life momentarily forgotten as Draco kept up his playful banter.

“You know,” Draco began, glancing sideways at her, “you’re starting to get way too good at ignoring me.”

Y/N looked at him, feigning innocence. “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Oh, come on,” Draco laughed, shaking his head. “You think I didn’t notice? You’ve been avoiding me with a masterful touch lately.”

Y/N smirked. “Maybe I’ve just been busy, Malfoy. Ever thought of that?”

“Busy avoiding me, no doubt,” Draco teased, nudging her lightly with his shoulder.

Y/N playfully shoved him back. “You’re insufferable.”

“And yet, you keep walking beside me,” Draco countered with a cocky grin.

"I'm doing it out of pity," Y/N said dryly, though her lips twitched.

Draco stopped walking, turning to face her fully. His smile faded slightly, and for a moment, Y/N thought she saw something else in his eyes—a little softer, a little more serious.

"I'm not joking, Y/N," Draco said quietly. "You've been acting strange around me lately. You know that, right?"

Y/N blinked, suddenly unsure of how to respond. "Strange?"

"Yeah. You're not as... sharp with your comebacks anymore. You're not pushing me away as much. It's like something's shifted." Draco stepped closer, and the teasing edge of his voice was replaced by a note of vulnerability. "What's going on?"

Y/N froze for a moment, unsure if she wanted to answer that. Her heart was racing—because Draco wasn't just poking fun anymore. He was asking her something deeper, and suddenly, she wasn't sure if she was ready to answer that question. But she had to. The walls inside her were collapsing bit by bit, and no amount of distraction could hide the truth anymore.

"I—I don't know what's going on," she admitted, looking down at her shoes. She hadn't meant for her voice to soften, but it did. "I think I've... been avoiding you because I'm not sure what I feel anymore."

Draco raised an eyebrow. "What do you mean?"

Y/N let out a shaky laugh, trying to mask the sudden fluttering in her chest. "You know, one minute you're infuriating, and the next... I don't know. You just have this way of... messing with my head. And it's confusing."

Draco stepped forward, his expression shifting to one of genuine curiosity. "So, you're confused?"

"Yeah," she admitted, her voice small. "I've been trying to make sense of it all. But whenever I try to, I just... I just think of you. And it's maddening."

For a moment, there was nothing but the sound of the breeze rustling the trees around them. Draco took a step closer, closing the gap between them, his eyes locking onto hers.

"You know, Y/N," Draco began, his voice low, "you're not the only one who's confused."

Y/N's breath caught in her throat. Was he...?

"I don't get it either," Draco continued, now standing so close that their shoulders were almost touching. "I've been trying to tell myself this whole time that you're just... a challenge. A way to pass the time. But every time I look at you, it's like something inside me... snaps. And I want more. I want you. Not as some stupid game, but..." He trailed off, his voice betraying him as he struggled to find the right words.

Y/N's heart pounded. Was this really happening? Was Draco Malfoy confessing?

"Are you... saying you like me?" she asked, her voice almost incredulous.

Draco glanced at her, a smirk tugging at the corner of his mouth. "You're still trying to make me say it, aren't you?"

Y/N crossed her arms over her chest, trying to regain some composure. "Well, if you're not going to say it, then I don't know what else to think."

“Fine,” Draco muttered, stepping even closer, until they were inches apart. “Yes, Y/N. I like you. A lot more than I should. You’re... you’re something I didn’t expect, and I don’t know what to do with it. But I can’t stop thinking about you.”

Y/N’s breath hitched. It wasn’t a dramatic confession, nor was it grand, but somehow, the way Draco said it made her heart swell. This wasn’t the same arrogant, self-absorbed Draco she’d known—this was a Draco who was, for once, being honest. Vulnerable. And it made her heart race even more than his teasing ever did.

“I don’t know what to do with you either,” she admitted, a soft smile tugging at her lips. “You make me crazy.”

Draco let out a small laugh, his usual smirk returning. “Guess we’re both crazy then.”

Y/N rolled her eyes. “What a pair.”

“Yeah,” Draco said, his smile softening as he reached out and tucked a loose strand of her hair behind her ear. “A pair that’s pretty much impossible to ignore.”

She looked up at him, her breath caught in her throat, as something that felt like the beginning of something real flickered in her chest. “So... now what?”

Draco leaned down slightly, his lips hovering just over hers. “Now, we stop pretending like we’re not both in this.”

And with that, Draco kissed her. It wasn’t a forceful kiss, nor was it one of those heated, passionate ones. It was soft, almost tentative, as though neither of them was entirely sure what they were doing, but both knew they didn’t want to stop.

When they pulled away, both were breathless, smiles on their faces.

“Now we just figure out where this takes us,” Draco said, his voice barely above a whisper.

Y/N nodded, her heart finally at ease. “Yeah. I think I’m ready for that.”

Chapter 18: The Unspoken Connection

The days following the unexpected shift between Draco and Y/N had left both of them in a new, slightly awkward territory. They were still figuring out how to navigate this thing they’d gotten into, the boundaries blurring between teasing, flirting, and something deeper. But in the midst of their growing connection, there was something else happening—something that neither of them had quite realized would also change the dynamics of their world.

It had started innocently enough. Theo had always been close to Draco, but over the past few weeks, his thoughts had drifted elsewhere. He found himself increasingly drawn to Vincent, who, though reserved, had a sharp wit and an unexpectedly warm smile that Theo had grown to admire.

Theo sat at the Slytherin table one evening, a goblet of pumpkin juice in hand, glancing at Vincent. The other boy was sitting a few seats down, reading something—most likely an obscure potion recipe. Vincent was always immersed in something, yet there was a certain charm about him that caught Theo’s attention every time.

"Why do you keep staring at him?" Draco's voice suddenly cut through the quiet buzz of conversation, his smirk playful but knowing.

Theo shot him an irritated look, not at all surprised that Draco had caught on. "I'm not staring. I'm just... observing."

"Observing?" Draco raised an eyebrow. "You sure? Because I thought 'observing' was what you did when you were trying to look at someone without them noticing."

Theo rolled his eyes. "You're impossible."

"I'm just saying," Draco continued, his voice lowering to a teasing whisper, "if you're going to stare at him, at least don't do it like you're planning on devouring him."

Theo's face flushed, but he quickly tried to cover it up with a sarcastic tone. "Right. Sure. I'll keep that in mind. Maybe I'll send him a formal invitation next time."

Draco chuckled. "Oh, I think he'll appreciate that."

As the days went on, it became clear that the more Theo tried to pretend he wasn't interested, the more his thoughts seemed to wander toward Vincent. But no matter how much he wanted to take action; something always held him back—fear? No. Maybe more like doubt.

On a particularly quiet night, when the common room was empty except for a few lingering students, Theo found himself alone with Vincent. They sat in comfortable silence, the fire crackling between them, until Theo couldn't hold it in any longer.

"So," Theo began casually, though his voice wavered just slightly. "How have you been?"

Vincent looked up from his book, his sharp eyes meeting Theo's. "Same old," he replied, his lips curving into a small, knowing smile. "You?"

Theo let out a soft chuckle. "Oh, you know. Same old complicated mess."

Vincent's smile widened a little, and for a moment, Theo thought he saw something in Vincent's gaze—something that made his heart skip. He quickly brushed the thought away.

There was an awkward pause before Theo spoke again, this time his voice a little softer, more vulnerable. "Do you ever... wonder why we're here? Like, why we're stuck in this endless loop of... well, everything?"

Vincent closed his book with a quiet snap and looked at Theo seriously. "I wonder that all the time."

Theo blinked, surprised at the intensity in Vincent's voice. But before he could respond, Vincent continued, his tone lighter now. "Sometimes I think we're just waiting for something to happen. Something... that'll make us realize why we're stuck here. In this school, in this house, in this... whatever it is between us."

Theo's heart raced, a feeling of anticipation building inside him. "Between us?"

Vincent didn't answer at first. Instead, he just looked at Theo for a long moment, his expression unreadable. Finally, he spoke, his voice low and steady.

"There's something between us, Theo. Something that neither of us wants to admit. But it's there. And I don't think I can ignore it anymore."

Theo's breath caught in his throat. Was this really happening?

Vincent leaned in closer, his gaze flickering to Theo's lips before meeting his eyes again. "I can't pretend I don't feel it. The connection. The way you make me... feel things I didn't even know I could feel."

Theo's pulse raced, his thoughts a jumbled mess. But one thing was clear: he couldn't run from this anymore. He couldn't deny what was happening. Not when Vincent was looking at him like that.

"I don't know how to handle this," Theo admitted, his voice barely above a whisper.

Vincent reached forward, gently placing a hand on Theo's, his touch warm and grounding. "You don't have to handle it alone. Not if you don't want to."

Theo felt a surge of emotion rise within him. His heart was beating faster, the connection between them undeniable now. He looked at Vincent, seeing something that was more than just physical attraction—there was something real there.

"Are we really doing this?" Theo asked, his voice shaking ever so slightly.

Vincent gave him a small, reassuring smile. "If you want to."

The moment seemed to stretch, but before Theo could say anything else, a familiar voice interrupted them.

"Am I interrupting something?" Draco's voice, dripping with playful sarcasm, came from the doorway. He leaned against the frame, a smirk on his face. "I mean, I just thought I'd pop in and see what's going on. You two seem awfully cozy."

Theo and Vincent both jumped, quickly pulling apart. Theo's face flushed with embarrassment, but Vincent just chuckled, his usual cool demeanour returning. "You're never far behind, are you, Malfoy?"

Draco shrugged, his eyes gleaming with mischief. "I know everything that goes on in this place. Especially when it involves my friends."

Theo glared at Draco. "You don't know everything."

"Oh, I beg to differ," Draco smirked, walking further into the room. "But don't worry, I won't tell anyone... yet."

Vincent rolled his eyes but smiled. "You'd better not, Malfoy."

Theo couldn't help but laugh at the absurdity of it all. The past few days had been an emotional rollercoaster, but now, with Vincent sitting beside him, Draco in his usual troublemaking glory, and Y/N somewhere out there waiting for him—he realized one thing: things were changing. And maybe, just maybe, these changes were worth it.

Chapter 19: Complicated Feelings and Quiet Confessions

The days had become a blur of laughter, stolen glances, and small moments of undeniable closeness. Theo and Vincent's relationship had blossomed, and while it wasn't public knowledge, it was becoming harder to ignore. Meanwhile, Draco and Y/N found themselves at a crossroads, inching closer to something deeper, something more real than either had expected.

It was late evening, and the Gryffindor common room was nearly empty. The fire crackled softly in the hearth, casting a warm glow on the walls. Y/N and Draco had slipped away from the crowd under the guise of getting some fresh air, though neither had actually left the building.

Y/N sat with her legs stretched out across one of the plush chairs, glancing up at Draco, who was leaning against the fireplace with his arms crossed, an unreadable look on his face.

"You've been awfully quiet today," Y/N remarked, raising an eyebrow. "Something wrong?"

Draco shrugged nonchalantly. "Just thinking."

"About what?" she pressed, curious.

He looked at her, his eyes softening just slightly. "About how things are changing, that's all. You, me, this... whatever it is between us."

Y/N's heart fluttered. She had noticed his mood change recently—he'd been more introspective, more... vulnerable. But it seemed to unsettle him as much as it intrigued her.

"I think it's changed for a while now," she said, sitting up in the chair, her tone more serious. "It's just... hard to figure out how to deal with it. How to label it."

Draco stepped forward, his gaze intense but playful. "Well, labels are overrated, don't you think? Sometimes you just have to feel it. Not worry about putting it into some neat little box."

Y/N met his eyes, her pulse quickening. There it was again. The way he looked at her—the way his words were both challenging and comforting at the same time.

"You're right," she admitted, her voice soft. "But sometimes, I feel like I'm on the edge of something I don't know how to handle."

"Maybe we're both on that edge," Draco said, walking closer, his voice low. "And maybe that's why I can't stay away from you. Because I don't want to let go. I don't want to lose this."

Y/N's breath hitched, and for the first time in a long time, she felt exposed in a way that was unfamiliar—and terrifying. But something inside her told her it was worth it. That this was the truth she had been avoiding, and now, standing in front of him, with nothing but raw honesty between them, she didn't want to run from it.

"I think I might be scared," Y/N confessed, almost in a whisper. "Scared of what this means. What we mean."

Draco reached out, his fingers gently brushing against hers. "I'm scared too, Y/N. But sometimes, fear is the first step toward something worth having."

Their eyes locked for a moment, and then, without warning, Draco leaned in, his lips brushing lightly against hers. The kiss was soft, tentative, like they were both testing the waters, afraid to dive too deep too soon. But the spark that flickered between them was undeniable.

When they pulled away, Draco's hand lingered at the back of Y/N's neck, his thumb brushing over her skin in slow, soothing motions. "I'm not going anywhere," he murmured, his voice filled with quiet conviction.

Y/N let out a breath she didn't realize she had been holding. "Neither am I."

Meanwhile, across the castle, Theo and Vincent had found themselves in a similar situation. The two had been spending more and more time together, their shared glances and small touches becoming something more than simple camaraderie. It was almost as though the world around them had faded away, leaving only the unspoken tension between them.

Theo was sitting on the edge of a couch in the Slytherin common room, Vincent beside him, their shoulders almost touching as they both stared into the fire. The flickering light made Vincent's features even more striking, his eyes shadowed but intense, his lips slightly parted as if he was about to speak but didn't know how.

"You know," Vincent started, breaking the silence, "I thought you were the last person I'd ever find myself... well, like this with."

Theo turned his head, meeting Vincent's gaze. "What do you mean?"

"I mean, I thought you were too... closed off, I guess," Vincent said, his voice soft but teasing. "Too focused on whatever it is that keeps you busy."

Theo raised an eyebrow. "I'm busy with you, now, aren't I?"

Vincent's lips quirked into a smile. "Touché."

Theo chuckled, feeling his stomach flutter at the sight of Vincent's smile—something he'd seen many times before, but never quite like this. It was softer. Real.

"I don't know what this is," Theo admitted, his voice almost apologetic. "But I know I don't want it to stop."

Vincent's smile softened, and he slowly reached out, placing his hand over Theo's. The touch was subtle, but to Theo, it felt like a promise—an unspoken agreement between them.

"I don't want it to stop either," Vincent said quietly. "But... I also don't want to screw this up."

Theo squeezed his hand gently, the words that had been on the tip of his tongue finally escaping. "Then let's just... take it slow. See where this goes."

For a long moment, neither of them spoke. The silence felt comfortable, even peaceful, as though they were both finally acknowledging something that had always been there but was never quite said aloud.

"I think I'd like that," Vincent murmured, before leaning in slowly and pressing his lips to Theo's in a kiss that was gentle, unhurried, but full of meaning.

It was the beginning of something new, something they weren't ready to define yet, but they both knew it was real.

Back in the Gryffindor common room, as the night deepened, Draco and Y/N were still lost in their own little world. Their conversation had shifted from the intensity of earlier moments to something more comfortable, more natural. The teasing was back, but there was an underlying warmth to it now, a shared understanding that things between them had changed.

"Do you ever think about how we got here?" Y/N asked, her voice playful again.

"Of course I do," Draco replied, leaning back against the couch with a smirk. "Mostly because I still can't figure out how you put up with me for this long."

Y/N raised an eyebrow. "Oh, trust me, Malfoy, you're not as charming as you think. I've just gotten really good at pretending."

Draco chuckled, rolling his eyes. "I knew you were pretending. That's why I keep pushing."

"You're impossible," Y/N said, but there was laughter in her voice now. "But I guess you're my impossible."

Draco grinned, and for the first time in ages, Y/N felt like everything was falling into place. Whatever came next—she was ready.

Chapter 20: Dark Desires and Unspoken Control

The Slytherin dungeons were colder than usual, the stone walls echoing with the sound of soft footsteps as Vincent and Theo made their way down the narrow corridor. The air felt thicker tonight, heavier with something unspoken between them. There had always been an undercurrent of tension between the two, but tonight, it was different—darker, charged with an electricity that neither could ignore.

Vincent's gaze was fixed ahead, his expression unreadable, though the intensity of his eyes spoke volumes. Theo, walking beside him, couldn't quite shake the feeling that something had changed. The air between them was thick with anticipation, and despite his usual composed demeanor, Theo felt a knot of uncertainty in his stomach.

"You've been quiet," Vincent finally spoke, his voice low and almost predatory. His words were more of a command than a question.

Theo glanced at him, his heart picking up pace. "I'm just thinking."

Vincent smirked, a dangerous glint in his eyes. "About what?"

Theo hesitated. He'd never been the type to hide his thoughts from Vincent before, but tonight, it felt different. There was a weight to Vincent's gaze, a silent pressure that made it hard to breathe.

"About you, actually," Theo admitted, his voice barely a whisper.

The smirk on Vincent's face deepened, and he stopped walking, causing Theo to halt in his tracks as well. Without warning, Vincent reached out and grabbed Theo's wrist, pulling him closer, his touch firm and possessive.

"I like that you're thinking about me," Vincent murmured, his breath warm against Theo's ear. "But I don't need you to think. I need you to feel."

Theo swallowed hard, his pulse quickening at the raw intensity in Vincent's voice. He knew Vincent wasn't just talking about their relationship; there was something deeper, something darker that lingered beneath his words.

"I don't need you to think about what this is, Theo," Vincent continued, his grip tightening just a fraction, "I need you to stop thinking and just let it happen. Let me have control."

Theo's breath caught in his throat. He had always been drawn to Vincent's confidence, his cool demeanor, but this—this was something else entirely. It wasn't just Vincent's dominance that pulled

Theo in; it was the way he could take control of the situation, of Theo's thoughts and emotions, without hesitation.

"I..." Theo started, but his words faltered under the weight of Vincent's gaze.

"You're not going to say anything, Theo," Vincent said, his voice dark and filled with command. "Not right now. You're just going to listen."

The pressure of Vincent's hand on his wrist, the heat of his breath against his skin, and the raw intensity of his gaze made it impossible for Theo to pull away. He was consumed, swallowed by the storm that was Vincent.

"Because right now," Vincent whispered, his lips brushing against Theo's ear, "I'm the one in control. And you're going to like it."

Theo's heart was pounding in his chest, his body responding to Vincent's words in a way that both terrified and excited him. He had always been the one to keep his emotions in check, to remain in control of every situation. But with Vincent, that control was slipping away, piece by piece, and the realization sent a shiver down his spine.

"I..." Theo began again, his voice shaking, but this time, Vincent silenced him with a single, commanding touch.

"Shh..." Vincent said, his finger gently pressing against Theo's lips, his other hand sliding down to grip his chin, forcing Theo to look at him. "Don't say anything. Just trust me."

Theo's breath hitched as Vincent's hand trailed down to his neck, his touch possessive, almost feral. He didn't want to admit it, but the more Vincent took control, the more Theo felt himself losing himself in the sensation. It wasn't just physical—it was mental, emotional, everything all at once.

"I'm going to make you forget everything else," Vincent continued, his voice low and teasing. "I'm going to make you feel things you never thought you would. Things you're afraid of."

Theo's hands gripped the fabric of Vincent's shirt, his knuckles white as he tried to hold onto something solid. He had never been in this position before—never had someone take control of him like this, and yet, he felt a twisted satisfaction in it. The dark, dangerous pull that Vincent had on him was undeniable, and as much as it scared him, it thrilled him just as much.

Vincent's lips were inches from Theo's now, his breath hot and ragged. "You want this, Theo," he whispered, his voice laced with dark promise. "You want me to take control. You want me to show you what it means to give in."

Theo's eyes fluttered shut as the words washed over him, the weight of them sinking deep into his bones. He didn't know if he was ready for this, for what Vincent was offering—but the way Vincent's hands roamed over his skin, the way his voice held so much power over him, made it impossible to resist.

"I..." Theo's voice broke, the words caught in his throat as Vincent's lips pressed against his in a kiss that was everything Theo hadn't known he needed. It was demanding, hungry, and filled with an intensity that left no room for hesitation.

Vincent pulled away slightly, his eyes dark with desire. "Say it, Theo," he murmured. "Tell me you want me."

Theo's heart raced, his chest rising and falling rapidly as he stared into Vincent's eyes, his mind swirling with confusion and longing. He knew he was losing himself in this, but part of him—a big part of him—didn't want to escape.

"I want you," Theo finally confessed, his voice a mixture of desperation and need. "I want this."

Vincent smirked, his grip on Theo's neck tightening slightly, and he kissed him again—this time deeper, more insistent. It was a kiss that sealed their unspoken agreement, a kiss that told them both that whatever they were about to embark on would be darker, deeper, and more dangerous than either had imagined.

As Vincent slowly pulled away, he looked at Theo with a knowing smile. "You don't know what you've just agreed to, but I promise you, you'll like it."

Theo could only nod, his mind spinning, and his body betraying him with every second.

Chapter 21: A New Beginning

It had been weeks since that night in the dungeons, the night that had marked the turning point for both Theo and Vincent. The Slytherin dungeons, which once felt cold and lonely, now seemed warmer, as if the air itself had been changed by the intensity of their feelings. And while their relationship was still new, still fragile in its own way, it had blossomed into something that neither of them had expected, yet both had come to cherish.

Vincent had continued to be the dominant force, but he had learned the art of balance. He understood now that control wasn't about overpowering Theo—no, it was about giving him a space to be himself, to grow, while still remaining the steady anchor that Vincent had always been. There were still moments of fire, moments of challenge, but there was also an unspoken understanding between them that this was no fleeting affair. This was real.

Theo sat in the common room, his fingers absentmindedly tracing the rim of his glass as he thought about how far they had come. The bruises from their more intense moments had long faded, but the emotional imprint remained, deep and undeniable. And now, when he looked at Vincent, he no longer saw just a dominant force, but a person he could trust, someone he could love in ways he never imagined possible.

Vincent, who sat across from him, was looking at him with an expression that was both affectionate and mischievous. "You look lost in thought," he said, a smirk tugging at the corner of his lips.

Theo smiled back, the weight on his chest finally lifted. "I was just thinking about how much I've changed. How much we've changed."

Vincent raised an eyebrow, his gaze softening as he leaned forward. "You're not the same Theo I met, and neither am I," he said, his voice low and sincere. "But I think that's a good thing."

Theo nodded, feeling the weight of those words settle into his heart. "Yeah. I think so, too."

Meanwhile, in the Gryffindor common room, Draco and Y/N had come to their own understanding. What had begun as something confusing, something filled with uncertainty, had bloomed into something more than either of them could have anticipated. The days of teasing and banter had given way to something deeper, and both of them had come to realize that they didn't need to define it—they simply needed to live it.

Y/N had always known she was different from the others. She had always been the strong one, the one who kept everything together. But with Draco, she had learned to let go, to trust, to be vulnerable. The walls she'd built had crumbled, and in their place, she found herself with Draco—strong, unpredictable, and yet, in his own way, a protector of sorts.

It was a crisp morning, and the grounds of Hogwarts were bathed in the soft light of early autumn. Y/N and Draco stood together at the edge of the lake, the silence between them comfortable, no longer awkward or laden with unspoken words. Draco turned to her, his expression softer than usual, as though he had something he needed to say, something important.

"You know, I've never been good at this," Draco began, his voice surprisingly tender.

Y/N raised an eyebrow. "Good at what?"

"At... feeling things," he admitted, his gaze dropping to the ground for a moment. "I've always been better at hiding them. But with you... it's different. And maybe that scares me a little."

Y/N smiled, her heart swelling at his honesty. She reached out, gently cupping his cheek, guiding his gaze back to hers. "You don't have to be perfect, Draco. I don't need you to be. I just need you to be here."

Draco's eyes softened as he leaned in, his lips brushing against hers in a kiss that was more than just a kiss—it was a promise. A promise that no matter the obstacles they had faced, no matter the past they had carried, they had made it through. Together.

When they pulled away, Draco rested his forehead against hers, his voice barely above a whisper. "I don't think I can live without you anymore."

Y/N laughed softly, the sound light and carefree. "You won't have to," she said, her voice filled with conviction. "I'm right here. Always."

A few weeks later, as the seasons shifted and the year drew to a close, both Theo and Vincent and Draco and Y/N stood at the crossroads of a new beginning. The once confusing, tumultuous paths they had walked had led them here—stronger, more confident, and more connected than ever before.

Theo and Vincent spent their time together in a way that no one could ever have predicted. Their relationship had become a quiet strength for both of them. They weren't just lovers; they were partners, each bringing out the best in the other. And while their bond remained passionate and intense, it had evolved into something more balanced, more stable. They had learned to trust each other in ways that neither of them thought was possible, and now, they couldn't imagine their lives without one another.

As for Draco and Y/N, the journey they had begun was still unfolding, but there was no doubt in their minds that this was where they were meant to be. They had grown closer, not just in moments of passion but in understanding, in the quiet moments where they simply existed together. The love that had sparked between them had blossomed into something unbreakable, and while they still had challenges to face, they faced them together.

The final day of the school year arrived, and the four of them—Vincent, Theo, Draco, and Y/N—stood together by the lake, watching the sun dip below the horizon, the sky painted in shades of orange and pink.

Theo looked at Vincent, a soft smile tugging at his lips. "We made it."

Vincent's eyes met his, and he gave a subtle nod. "Yeah. We did."

Draco turned to Y/N, his gaze steady and sure. "No more games, right?"

Y/N smiled, her heart light. "No more games. Just us. Together."

And as they stood there, side by side, the world felt right again. The past had been complicated, filled with challenges and uncertainties, but the future was clear. Together, they would face whatever came next, knowing that they had each other—unwavering, unbreakable.

Bonus 1: The Fire Between Us

The cold stone walls of the Slytherin dungeons never felt colder, nor did the silence feel so suffocating. Draco and Y/N were alone, the flickering light from a nearby candle casting shadows that danced like demons on the walls.

Draco stood across from her, his posture tense, his eyes locked onto hers with a look that was far from the usual playful smirk. No, tonight was different. Tonight, something was raw, something that burned between them like wildfire.

Y/N's breath quickened as she took a step forward, her voice low, her eyes full of defiance. "What are you going to do, Draco?"

Draco's lips twitched into a dangerous grin. "You know exactly what I'm going to do."

Before Y/N could react, Draco closed the distance between them in one fluid motion, his hands gripping her shoulders firmly, almost painfully. His breath was hot against her skin, his eyes dark with an intensity she'd never seen before.

"You think you can challenge me?" he murmured, his lips brushing against her ear. "You think you can control me?"

Y/N's pulse raced as she found herself trapped between the cold stone wall and his burning presence. She wanted to pull away, but there was something inside her, something wild, that wanted this. Wanted him.

"No," she whispered, her voice trembling, but there was a fire in her eyes. "I want to see if you can handle me."

His smirk widened, and in an instant, his lips crashed against hers—hard, demanding, rough. He wasn't gentle. He didn't want to be gentle. He kissed her like he was claiming her, like she was his and his alone.

Y/N gasped into the kiss, her hands fisting in his shirt, the desperation building within her as she kissed him back with equal fervor. She was no longer just the girl who had caught his eye—she was the woman who challenged him, who pushed him to the edge of everything he thought he could control.

"You don't know what you're asking for, Y/N," Draco muttered between kisses, his hands slipping down to her waist, pulling her closer, if that was even possible. "But I'll show you."

Her heart hammered in her chest as his hands slid lower, gripping her thighs, lifting her effortlessly off the ground. She wrapped her legs around his waist instinctively, her breath hitching as she felt the heat between them intensify.

"You want this, don't you?" Draco asked, his voice low, dripping with desire and something darker—something possessive.

Y/N's hands slid to the back of his neck, pulling him into another kiss that was hungry, desperate. "I want you," she whispered back, her voice shaking but full of conviction. "No one else."

Draco's grip tightened around her, his eyes locking onto hers with a burning intensity. "Good. Because you belong to me. And I'm not going to let you go."

The words were like a spark to dry tinder. Her body responded instinctively, arching against him, as their kisses became fiercer, more frantic, like they were both trying to consume each other entirely. This wasn't just lust; this was something deeper. It was about power, control, and submission. It was about the raw, unfiltered emotions they were too scared to acknowledge in the light of day.

"You'll never be free of me," Draco growled against her lips, his hands moving possessively over her body, sending waves of heat rushing through her. "I will keep you close. Always."

Y/N's mind spun, her world spinning out of control as Draco's touch became more insistent, more demanding. And in that moment, she realized—she didn't want control. She wanted to be his. In this moment, she wanted nothing more than to surrender to the fire between them.

Chapter 22: The Dark Game Between Us

The night air in the Slytherin common room was thick with tension, the quiet hum of anticipation vibrating between Theo and Vincent as they stood facing each other. The flickering flames from the fireplace illuminated the room in a soft glow, casting long shadows that seemed to stretch and twist like the darkness inside them both.

Vincent had been unusually quiet tonight, his gaze sharp, his posture rigid with restraint. Theo knew something was wrong—he could feel it in the air. The unspoken words hung between them, charging the atmosphere with a tension that was both thrilling and dangerous.

"You've been distant," Theo's voice broke the silence, his tone low and careful. "What's going on, Vincent?"

Vincent didn't answer immediately. Instead, he stepped closer, his eyes burning with something darker, something that made Theo's heart skip a beat. "You're right," he said finally, his voice a dangerous whisper. "I've been holding back. But I don't want to anymore."

Before Theo could respond, Vincent grabbed him by the wrist, yanking him forward, their bodies crashing together in a forceful kiss. It was harsh, demanding, a kiss that left no room for anything but raw, unrelenting passion. Theo gasped as he felt the heat of Vincent's lips, the pressure of his hands as they roamed possessively over Theo's body.

"You've been mine since the moment you walked into my life," Vincent growled against Theo's lips, his grip tightening around his waist. "And I've been holding myself back from showing you just how much."

Theo's breath caught in his throat as Vincent's hands slid lower, pulling him closer, forcing their bodies to mold together in a way that left no room for doubt. The power Vincent had over him was undeniable, intoxicating, and yet, a part of Theo still resisted. He had always been the one in control, but with Vincent, everything was different. He was losing himself.

"I won't let you slip away," Vincent whispered darkly, his breath hot on Theo's ear. "You belong to me, Theo. And I'll remind you of that over and over again until you feel it."

Theo's mind spun with the words, but his body betrayed him. He felt himself give in, felt the darkness of Vincent's words wrapping around him, pulling him deeper into this storm. He kissed Vincent back with the same ferocity, his hands threading into Vincent's hair, his body pressing against his with a desperation that surprised even him.

"You think you can control me?" Theo asked, his voice filled with a mixture of defiance and desire.

Vincent's eyes darkened, his lips curling into a smirk. "I don't need to control you, Theo. I just need you to understand that you're mine. Completely. Every part of you."

Theo's heart pounded as Vincent's hands explored his body, his touch rough, possessive. There was no gentle tenderness here—only the sharp, raw desire to claim and possess. Theo's body trembled beneath him, both from the intensity of the moment and the overwhelming need to give in.

"Say it," Vincent demanded, his voice low, his fingers gripping Theo's chin to tilt his head back. "Say that you're mine."

Theo's breath hitched, the words on the tip of his tongue. He wanted to resist, to pull away, but a deeper part of him—the part that had always longed for this—wanted to surrender. And so, he did.

"I'm yours," he breathed, his voice barely above a whisper, but it was enough. Vincent's eyes flared with dark satisfaction.

"I knew you'd say it," Vincent muttered, his lips crashing against Theo's once more. The kiss was brutal, relentless, and it burned with a darkness that neither of them could escape.
